Eitaikyo & Pet Memorial Services - The Bonds That Remain

November has arrived. This month, we will hold our Eitaikyo Service and Pet Memorial Service. Both services give us an opportunity to remember our loved ones and the animals who have been part of our lives.

Have you ever found yourself doing something out of habit, even though someone you loved is no longer there? For example, you might pick up a favorite food of a family member who has passed away while shopping at the grocery store. Or perhaps you were used to making two cups of coffee every morning, and one day you realize that you have prepared two cups again, even though you now live alone.

The same thing can happen after losing a pet. Months after your dog has passed away, you might drop some food on the floor and immediately think, “I need to pick that up before the dog eats it!” Or after losing your cat, you might still carefully open the front door, making sure the cat does not run outside. Sometimes, when something funny happens, you might think, “I should tell them about this!” Then, a moment later, you remember that you can no longer call that person. We understand in our minds that our loved ones are no longer here. Yet our bodies and daily habits sometimes continue as if they were still with us. Isn’t that interesting?

We usually think of death as the end of someone’s life. However, even after someone passes away, their presence does not completely disappear from our daily lives. Perhaps you still cook a dish that your grandmother taught you. Maybe you sometimes use an expression that your father often said. When facing a difficult decision, you might even ask yourself, “What would that person do?” These small moments remind us that we are not simply individuals living on our own. We are shaped by the many people and living beings we have encountered throughout our lives.

In Chapter Five of the Tannisho, Shinran Shonin teaches:
“All living beings have been our parents, brothers, and sisters throughout countless lives.”

This teaching reminds us that all living beings have been connected to us through the countless cycles of birth and death. The words “all living beings” include not only human beings, but also animals and all other forms of sentient life.

In our daily lives, we often make distinctions between our family and strangers, between humans and animals, and between lives that are important to us and those we rarely think about. However, Shinran Shonin’s words invite us to see that our connections with other lives are much deeper and wider than we usually imagine.

Shinran Shonin also taught that the Nembutsu is not something we say to create merit and transfer it to our deceased family members. Rather, through Amida Buddha’s Primal Vow, we are guided toward birth in the Pure Land, where we become Buddhas and work for the benefit of all beings.

In Jodo Shinshu Buddhism, memorial services are not held because the deceased need us to save them through our prayers. Instead, through our connections with those who have passed away, we are given the opportunity to listen to the Buddha’s teachings.

For example, imagine a grandmother who placed her hands together in gassho every morning before the family Obutsudan. As a child, you may not have understood why she did this. But many years after her passing, you might remember her sitting quietly in front of the altar. That memory may lead you to become interested in Buddhism and begin listening to the Dharma.

Although your grandmother is no longer physically present, your connection with her continues to guide you toward the Buddha’s teachings.

Our pets also teach us many things. Although we cannot communicate with them through words in the same way we do with people, they teach us the joy of sharing our lives with another being. They remind us that life does not always go according to our plans. And when the time comes to say goodbye, they help us recognize the Buddhist teaching of impermanence, nothing in this world lasts forever.

Of course, the sadness of losing someone we love does not simply disappear. And as the years pass, we may find ourselves thinking about them less often. But that does not mean our connections with them have lost their meaning. We do not only remember those who have passed away. Through the relationships we shared with them, we continue to learn about ourselves, our lives, and the lives of others.

As we gather for our Eitaikyo Service and Pet Memorial Service this November, I hope these occasions will give us an opportunity not only to remember our loved ones and beloved animals, but also to reflect on the many connections that have shaped our lives.

May we continue to listen to the Dharma with gratitude for all the lives we have encountered.

Last Month's Quiz Answer

According to this month's article, what can the Japanese phrase "Itadakimasu" remind us of?

A. We should always cook our own food.
B. Our food is connected to many lives, people, and causes.
C. We should be thankful only to the person who prepared our meal.

D. We should eat as quickly as possible.

Answer: B

Our food is connected to many lives, people, and causes. "Itadakimasu" reminds us of these connections and encourages gratitude.

"B.R.A.I.D." – Building Respectful Awareness

"All conditioned things are impermanent. When one sees this with wisdom , one turns away from suffering." – from the Dhammapada

For the past year or so, I have been poking around the State, seeing if various colleges might hold my interest. This weekend, I was fortunate enough to be able to drive down to San Luis Obispo for a college tour at Cal Poly SLO. Earlier this year, I toured UCLA. While both colleges were outstanding campuses with staff and students who genuinely seem to love their experiences there, I couldn't help but to continue to wonder whether or not I would be able to be accepted to those colleges, and whether or not I would enjoy attending. For the former, that is something that I don't really have much control over, and so is something that I have personally learnt to not let consume my thoughts. The latter, however, is something that I continue to worry over whenever I'm reminded about my impending graduation, whether that's me needing to fill out my college application or just getting asked what college I want to go to. This is something that I continue to attempt to be mindful about, as worrying about the implications of tomorrow doesn't make today any easier to go through.

Mits Yamamoto's Artwork – "I Believe"

This month, I would like to introduce another artwork by Mr. Mits Yamamoto. The word featured in this piece is "I Believe."

In our daily lives, we often say things like "Believe in yourself," "Believe in the future," or "Believe in someone you love." However, even when we want to believe, we sometimes feel doubt, fear, or uncertainty. Our hearts are not always strong or steady.

In Jodo Shinshu Buddhism, we have an important word, Shinjin. It is sometimes translated as "Faith," but personally, I feel that "Entrusting Heart" is a better translation.

This is because Shinjin is not about trying hard to believe in something through our own efforts. Rather, it is about receiving Amida Buddha's compassion and entrusting ourselves to the working of the Primal Vow. Even this entrusting heart is not something we create by ourselves, but something we receive from Amida Buddha.

In November, we observe our Eitaikyo and Pet Memorial Services. When we lose someone precious to us, whether a person or a beloved animal, our hearts may be filled with sadness and uncertainty.

Yet, even when our hearts are shaken, Amida Buddha's compassion never changes.

What matters is not how strongly we can believe, but recognizing the compassion of Amida Buddha that never abandons us.

Through this simple word, "Believe," Mits Yamamoto's artwork invites us to reflect on what it truly means to believe and to entrust.

Gassho,
Noritaka Imada
